Not illustrated. 1829 Excerpt: ...of the principal entrance, soon told the object and intention of the building. As a specimen of modern architecture, the Arsenal possesses great merit. Its style, which approaches to the Palladian, is grave, and bears a character of great solidity. These qualities of the building are in character with its purpose. The portico attached to the principal story forms a very striking and pleasing feature in the compo270 THE ARSENAL AT BERLIN. sition of the facade; and the whole constitutes, perhaps, the finest building of this class in Berlin. The interior of the Arsenal, for one who is neither a military man nor fond of military parade, offers but a monotonous and uninteresting sight. Here is a long range of guns and fieldpieces, with tumbrils and caissons: there, bombs and mortars, howitzers, blunderbusses, and musquets. One of the walls groans under a load of sabres, swords, and pick-axes: another is almost too small to hold the groups of battle-axes, halberts, sarbacans, and culverins. In fact, all the instruments of destruction that have been devised by man to injure, maim, and annihilate his fellow-creatures, are here systematically and beautifully arranged, ready to gratify curiosity, or serve as models for the instruction of future heroes. These are the museums and their scientific classifications for a soldier. It is not without reason that the good people of Berlin have selected the immediate neighbourhood of the palace of their King, and such a warlike place as the Arsenal, for the purpose of placing the colossal statue of Bliicher, intended to commemorate the glorious achievements of that great general. The hero stands on the opposite side of the Arsenal, and seems by his attitude, and the daring expression of his manly countenance, to bid his countr...
