Zimbabwe: Why Is One of the World's Least Free Economies Growing So Fast? (Policy Analysis 722) (Cato Policy Analysis) Craig J. Richardson

Between 2009 and 2011, Zimbabwe's GDP growth averaged an impressive 7.3 percent, making it one of the world's fastest growing countries. Yet Worldwide Governance Indicators place Zimbabwe's government among the world's worst, and the Fraser Institute's Economic Freedom of the World index ranks it as one of the world's least economically free countries. This report argues that Zimbabwe's recent growth rates do not accurately reflect its long-term economic prospects. Rather, they draw attention away from the country's continuing pressing problems, including an inadequate food supply, poor government, and a bloated government sector.
